Joe rogan bernie sanders podcast

U.S. President Donald Trump wants to debate Joe Biden on Joe Rogan's widely popular podcast, The Joe Rogan Experience. President Trump took to Twitter on Monday morning, responding to Tim Kennedy, a retired MMA fighter, who tweeted asking if people would like to see Rogan moderate a debate. I do, Tweeted Trump. When Kennedy's tweet began to gain traction on social media, the former wrestler also outlined a plan on how it should be done. A long debate with a neutral moderator. No false reactions from the public. No biased questions. Neutral camera positions. No sound bite length responses. Only their respective policies explained to us, tweeted. Please, Donald Trump and Joe Biden make this happen. It's worth noting that Rogan said he would vote for Donald Trump over Joe Biden. A debate on the Joe Rogan Experience would be significant for audio streaming giant Spotify (SPOT) - Get Report. The company entered Joe Rogan's podcast in an exclusive multi-year licensing agreement in May. Spotify has been heavily focused on the podcast industry, bringing high-profile names like Joe Rogan and former first lady Michelle Obama to the platform. Spotify did not respond to TheStreet's request for comment on Trump's tweet. There are three official debates between Trump and Biden taking place on September 29, October 15 and October 22. Latest videos from TheStreet and Jim Cramer: Senator Bernie Sanders emphasized his position on Medicare for All at the 2020 Democratic presidential debate on June 27. Initial polls show the septuagenarian ranking among the most popular candidates. The senator is worth $2 million. The second round of the 2020 Democratic presidential debates took place on June 27, and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders did not hold back as he faced off against the party's more centrist candidates, advocating real change. He emphasized his position on Medicare for All, raising his hand when asked if he would give up his private insurance plan for a government-run alternative. Senator Sanders shared the stage with Sen. Kamala Harris, D-

Eric Swalwell, D-Calif.; Marianne Wilson and Andrew Yang. Early polls show Sen. Sanders at the top of the group, along with Biden, Senator Harris, Buttigieg and Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass. The Vermont Independent is a self-described democratic socialist, and the career politician has fought for the American middle class while admonition the ultra-rich. Senator Sanders has been a longtime champion for the Middle and Lower American classes. Here's a look at his net worth as he prepares for another presidential run. His claim to fame may be taking third place in the 2016 presidential election, but Sanders remains one of the country's most popular politicians. During the 2016 presidential election, he won the hearts and minds of millennial voters in part because of his platform of free college tuition, LGBTQ rights, environmental protection, fair taxes among socioeconomic classes, and relaxed marijuana laws. In the first two years of President Donald Trump's term, Sanders has been in direct opposition to the president and voted against government legislation more than 80% of the time. He and his family lived in a modest apartment controlled by rent. Sanders left Brooklyn to study at the University of Chicago. In the early 1960s, Sanders grew up during the Civil Rights Movement and was a student activist who organized protests in opposition to segregation. He was also one of 250,000 people who descended on Washington, D.C., to hear Martin Luther King Jr.'s historic speech during the march on Washington in August 1963. Sanders eventually moved to Vermont and hit the political scene in the 1970s. After failed attempts to win a seat in the U.S. Senate, Sanders focused his efforts on local government, and in 1981, Sanders won the mayoral race in Burlington, Vermont. In 1990, Sanders made the leap into state politics and became the only Vermont congressman. Over the past three decades, Sanders has faced major drugmakers, rebuked the war, championed the Affordable Care Act, and fought for low-income Americans. After a series of primary victories and the announcement that Senator Bernie Sanders, his remaining rival, would be suspending his campaign, former Vice President Joe Biden is now the presumptive Democratic nominee. While exit polls show that most black women and voters chose him over Sanders during this year's primaries, there is an important demographic that preferred Sanders: people who are between 18 and 44. In many states, Sanders has won about two-thirds of the under-45s, while Biden won about two-thirds of over-45s. Now, Biden needs young people in November's general election, most crucially in swing states that could topple the Electoral College. Electoral. a significant number of them said they will stay home or vote for a third-party candidate unless Biden makes significant proposals to the left wing of the party, which is made up mostly of young Americans. Moreover, voter turnout in this group is already fickle (partly due to voter suppression, as we saw in this primary). It stands to be the point that if Biden and the Democrats want to beat President Trump, they need to listen to young people and make meaningful changes, both political and rhetorical. And if Biden's camp wants to prove its repeated point that politics is about compromise and coalition building, there's no better place to start than building a bridge to America's youth. There are several things Biden needs to do. First is politics. It's true that Biden's proposals on issues such as climate change, immigration, criminal justice and student debt are objectively more progressive than Obama's during his presidential campaign. But for many young people today, that's not enough. We are at a very different time than we were in 2008, and the urgency around income inequality, climate change and student debt has increased - partly because the scope of the problems has worsened, and partly because Bernie Sanders' movement has influenced the Democratic Party to address these issues more boldly. Immediately after Sanders' resignation yesterday, a group of millennial-led progressive organizations and Gen Z issued an open letter to Biden urging him to withdraw his messages of return to normalcy if he wants his support and enthusiasm. For so many young people, going back to the way things were 'before Trump' is not a motivating enough reason to vote in November, the letter says. And now, the coronavirus pandemic has exposed not only Trump's failure, but how decades of policymaking have failed to create a robust social safety net for the vast majority of Americans. Organizations included the Alliance for Youth Action, Justice Democrats, IfNotNow Movement, March for Our Lives Action Fund, NextGen America, Student Action, Sunrise Movement and United We Dream Action. We need you to stand up for the bold ideas that galvanized our generation and gave us hope in the political process, they wrote, reminding you that young people are problems in the first place rather than first-party voters. To win up and down the polls in November, the Democratic Party needs the energy and enthusiasm of our generation. They're asking Biden to take the Green New Deal framework and commit to $10 trillion in green and infrastructure investments, take an intersectional approach to reducing gun violence with the goal of reducing gun deaths by 50% in 10 years, supporting Medicare for All, supporting marijuana legalization, supporting free undergraduate tuition, and student debt, and more. They are also asking Biden to appoint progressive lawmakers, including Sanders and Senator Elizabeth Warren, as political policy campaign and its potential presidential transition team. Younger and more daring politicians like Pramila Jayapal, Katie Porter and Ayanna Pressley are also on the list. In light of the Trump administration's abuses of immigrants, they're asking him to appoint a Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security who would be committed to holding [U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement] and [U.S. Customs and Border Protection] accountable, dismantling ICE and CBP as we know them. Finally, they asked him to create a task force of young Americans in the White House to advise him as president. But that's not all. The letter stressed that it's not just about the issues, it's about how Biden talks about them, and whether it's clear that he's both passionate and sincere. You must authentically demonstrate that you empathize with the struggles of our generation. On the 2020 campaign trail, candidates like Biden and Amy Klobuchar opted for a real get approach rather than a big-idea approach when it comes to everything from health care to free tuition. This is a tactic that comforts democrats closer to the center and politicians because they recognize that manifesting big, sweeping, ambitious changes is very difficult - and very rare. Some people prefer to listen let's prevent Republicans from repealing the Affordable Care Act than we need Medicare for All, now because the former seems more tangible and doable. But young people don't want to hear their politicians coernating and saying that big, necessary things aren't possible. They want to see ambitious ideas, and political will, and urgency, around all the crises facing the country now. They want them to speak the language of change. That's why Sanders' message attracted so much to them. For Biden, speaking the language of change means addressing the substance of the youth organizations' charter. It means not saying things like time to realise when asked about Medicare for All, or telling young people that it's not really that hard for them out there. It also means that he should not only make it clear that his positions on abortion issues to LGBTQ+ bankruptcy law have changed, but also address the push for these ideological developments —not defensively. It's also important for Biden to find the right replacements for his message, and that means people who relate and know how to reach young voters. The other day, a friend told me she's not sure if she wants to vote for Biden because where has he been while all this is going on?. Biden is everywhere a presidential candidate can be reasonably now: in TV appearances, advising Trump on his response to coronavirus, holding virtual town halls, starting a podcast. But there is still a disconnect when it comes to reaching young voters, and the right surrogates can with that. It could certainly lead to more young people, like Daniela Ferrera, who already supports Biden making the case for his peers. Ferrera is 22 years old, lives in and supported Biden from the start. Part of reaching young people, she believes, is hammering at home that there is no equivalence between Donald Trump and Joe Biden. Trump's four more years means more spoiling independent oversight of government agencies, more filling crucial government positions with incompetent comparators -- or no one else, and more far-right judges in the Supreme Court and other courts. It means going down even further into the dictatorship of reality tv. Young people need to understand that these choices aren't just about Trump and Joe Biden, it's about the Supreme Court, it's about the candidates to the polls - it's about the impact we'll have on our country in the coming decades, Ferrera told Refinery29. It seems Biden is listening to the message of young people. How he and his team interpret this in the coming months will have a huge impact on what happens in November. To Bernie's supporters: I know I need to win your votes, he tweeted yesterday. And I know this could take time. But I want you to know that I see you, I hear you, and I understand the urgency of this moment. I hope you'll join us. You are more than welcome: You are needed.
